When Jean Valjean stopped the noise ceased; the police listened and heard nothing, they looked and saw nothing, and hence consulted together. The squad set out wain, leaving Jean Vailean behind; and in all this movement he perceived nothing except the eclipse of the lantern, which was suddenly turned away.

Before starting, the sergeant, to satisfy his police conscience, discharged his carbine in the direction where Jean Valjean was. who as we have said, no longer re-sembled himself. He did not unfold his trms, but secured his grasp of his cludgeon by an imperceptible movement, and said, in a sharp, caim voice: "Who are you?"
"Myself,"
"What do you mean?"
"I am Jean Vallean."
Javert placed his cudgel between his teeth, bent his knees, bowed his back, isld his two powerful hands on Jean Vallean's shoulders, which they held as in two vises, examined and recognized

Their faces almost touched, Javert's glance was terrific. Jean Valjean remained inert under Javert's grip, like a lion enduring the claws of a lynx. "Inspector Javert," he said, "you have me. Besides, since this morning I have considered myself your prisoner. I did not give you my address in order to try and escape you. Take me, but grant me one thing."

Javert did not seem to hear, but kept his gyeballs fixed on Jean Valjean.

Javert's face was contracted in the same way as it always was when any one helieved him capable of a concession; still he did not say so. He stooped again, took from his pocket a handker-chief which he dipped in the water, and wiped Marjus's ensanguined forehead.

"This man was at the barricade," he said in a low voice, and as if speaking to himself; "he was the one whom they called Marjus."

He was a first-class spy, who had observed everything, listened to everything, heard everything and picked up everything when he believed himself a dead man who even spied in his death agony, and, standing on the first step of the sepulchre took notes.

He seized Marius's hand and felt his pulse.

He seized Marius's hand and felt his pulse.

"He is wounded." said Jean Valjean. "He is a dead man," said Javert.
Jean Valjean replied—
"No: not yet."
"Then you brought him from the barricade here?" Javert observed.
His preoccupation must have been great for him not to dwell on this alarming escape through the sewers, and not even remark Jean Valjean's silence after his question. Jean Valjean, on his side, seemed to have a sole thought; he continued:
"He lives in the Marais, in the Rue des Filles du Calvaire, with his grandfather. I do not know his name."
Jean Valjean felt in Marius's pocket, took out the portfolio, opened it at the page on which Marius had written in pencil, and offered it to Javert. There was still sufficient floating light in the air to be able to read, and Javert, besides, had in his eyes the feline phosphorescence of night birds.
He decibered the few lines written by Marius, and growled:

POLICY MAN SENTENCED.

Donnelly the First Offender to Years to Be Imprisoned for Selling "Slips."

Judge Cowing in General Sessions this morning sentenced John Donnelly, of $14 Water street, to the penitentiary for four months for setting a policy slip. This is the first time in years that a person convicted of this crime has been sentenced to prison. Frevious violations of the law have been punished by fine.

"I am not unmindful." Judge Cowing said. "that you were only an employee. There are those behind you who should suffer the punishment you must suffer, but they cannot apparently be caught. The only persons who seem to be unfortunate enough to be arrested are men like yourself working for a small pittance. The law must be respected and the soner this is known the better."
